

HO-1011
Rev. Burton Highley House
7953 Old Jessup Road
Private

Description:

The Rev. Burton Highley House is set close to the road and faces southwest toward the road. It is a 2 ½-story, five-bay by one-bay, seven-to-one common bond brick structure with a gable roof that has asphalt shingles and a northwest-southeast ridge. On the northeast side are two adjacent two-story brick ells that are one bay deep and two bays wide. They have gable roofs that have southwest-northeast ridges and together virtually form an "M" roof. In the center of these two ells is a projecting two-story ell, of two bays by one bay, and it has brick on the first story, frame on the second story, and a shallow gable with a southwest-northeast ridge. All of these ell roofs have asphalt shingles. On the northwest is a one-story enclosed porch with a low brick wall, brick piers, and a hipped roof with asphalt shingles.

Significance:

In November 1878 Rev. Burton Highley, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in Jessup, purchased a one-acre lot on the Jessup to Waterloo Road for $200. The low cost of the land suggests that there were no improvements on it. Rev. Highley's house does not show up on the 1878 Hopkins Atlas of Howard County, which was probably surveyed too early. He may have started the building in the year he purchased the lot, but likely completed in c. 1879. The dwelling he constructed was a traditional five-bay, center-passage-plan I-house, apparently with a kitchen ell on the rear. It was given some stylistic currency through the low pitched gable with a cross-gable on the front containing an oculus. The use of brick and, apparently, jib windows that would have opened onto a five-bay porch across the front also made a statement about the pastor's affluence and position in the community. The porch would have been another area of the house ripe for decorative treatment, but it has since been removed and the windows altered. Despite these unfortunate changes, the house retains most of its character-defining features.

Summary:

The Rev. Burton Highley House is located at 7953 Old Jessup Road in Jessup, in eastern Howard County, Maryland. The house is set close to the road and faces southwest toward the road. It is a 2 ½-story, five-bay by one-bay, seven-to-one common bond brick structure with a gable roof that has asphalt shingles and a northwest-southeast ridge. On the northeast side are two adjacent two-story brick ells that are one bay deep and two bays wide. They have gable roofs that have southwest-northeast ridges and together virtually form an "M" roof. In the center of these two ells is a projecting two-story ell, of two bays by one bay, and it has brick on the first story, frame on the second story, and a shallow gable with a southwest-northeast ridge. All of these ell roofs have asphalt shingles. On the northwest is a one-story enclosed porch with a low brick wall, brick piers, and a hipped roof with asphalt shingles.

On the northeast side are two adjacent two-story brick ells that are one bay deep and two bays wide. They have gable roofs that have southwest-northeast ridges and together virtually form an "M" roof. In the center of these two ells is a projecting two-story ell, of two bays by one bay, and it has brick on the first story, frame on the second story, and a shallow gable with a southwest-northeast ridge. All of these ell roofs have asphalt shingles. On the northwest is a one-story enclosed porch with a low brick wall, brick piers, and a hipped roof with asphalt shingles.

The southwest elevation has new double doors in an original opening in the center bay, with infill above where there was apparently a transom. There is a new one-bay porch with square wood posts, a gable roof with asphalt shingles, and aluminum siding in the gable. To either side is a modern six-over-six sash with brick infill below the windows and brick patching above that suggests that there were lintels that have been removed, and that the windows were probably originally jibs that opened onto the front porch. There are ghosts and patches in the brickwork between the first and second stories that indicate a hip-roofed porch covered all five bays at one time. The second story has five new one-over-one sash with brick infill between the bottom of the sash and the original sills below. There is also new brick infill above the windows that suggests that there were lintels here, too, that were replaced. There is a central gabled wall dormer with an oculus. There is a boxed cornice with returns, all now covered with aluminum. The southwest elevation of the porch has four new fixed eight-light sash.

The northwest elevation of the ell is flush with the main block and the running bond brickwork is toothed into the main block wall in several locations, but mostly abuts the wall. The first story of both the ell and the main block are covered by the porch, which has three bays with paired two-light sash in each bay. The second story of the main block has a one-over-one sash with patched brickwork on both sides and below it. There is no opening in the gable end. The second story of the ell has a one-over-one sash with patched brickwork below it. This ell has an interior brick chimney on the gable end with corbelling at the top and brick piers at the four corners that are three courses high.

The southeast elevation of the main block has a three-sided bay window with a low brick wall, aluminum siding above, a one-over-one sash on each side, and a steeply pitched roof with asphalt shingles. The second story has a one-over-one sash that appears to retain an original wood lintel. There is no opening in the gable end. The ell appears to have a one-over-one sash on both stories, and the brickwork appears to be continuous with the main block. The northeast elevation was not accessible for examination. There is a large modern building behind the house that does not appear to be historic.

Significance:

In November 1878 Rev. Burton Highley, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in Jessup, purchased a one-acre lot on the Jessup to Waterloo Road from Joshua Anderson, the postmaster at Jessup, for $200. The low cost of the land suggests that there were no improvements on it. Jessup, named for Jessup's Cut on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, was the location of a stop on the railroad, and this gave it a reason for becoming a small settlement in the mid-nineteenth century. The community spread onto both sides of the Howard County-Anne Arundel County border, and became a hub of activity around the time that Rev. Highley purchased his lot because of the construction of the Maryland House of Correction.<sup>1</sup>

Rev. Highley's house does not show up on the 1878 Hopkins Atlas of Howard County, which was probably surveyed too early. He may have started the building in the year he purchased the lot, but likely completed in c. 1879. The dwelling he constructed was a traditional five-bay, center-passage-plan I-house, apparently with a kitchen ell on the rear. It was given some stylistic currency through the low pitched gable with a cross-gable on the front containing an oculus. The cross-gable was popularized especially by A. J. Downing in his book, The Architecture of Country Houses, published in 1850, but seems to have been slow to catch on in Howard County until the final quarter of the nineteenth century. Thus, Rev. Highley was making a statement by employing it on his new house. The use of brick and, apparently, jib windows (or alternatively, windows that extended down to the baseboard) that would have opened onto a five-bay porch across the front also made a statement about the pastor's affluence and position in the community. The porch would have been another area of the house ripe for decorative treatment, but it has since been removed and the windows altered. Despite these unfortunate changes, the house retains most of its character-defining features. At an unknown date another ell was added to the rear, and then a longer, narrower ell added between the two ells creating, in effect, a double-pile house.<sup>2</sup>

In 1880 Rev. Highley purchased an adjoining ¼ acre tract to enlarge his home lot. In the early twentieth century he got into some financial trouble and the house was sold in a court-ordered auction. It quickly passed through several hands before ending up in the possession of Noah Bailey of York County, Pennsylvania. It is not known whether Bailey was a relative, or simply someone looking for an investment, but he owned the house until 1923, though he remained in York County. He sold it to Charles Bailey, who was likely his son, and Charles moved to Howard County and held onto the house until 1958.
