

HO-1013
Arma Gardner House
7948 Old Jessup Road
Private

Description:

The Arma Gardner House is located on the southwest side of the road and faces northeast, toward the road. It is a 2 ½-story, two-bay by three-bay frame structure with a brick foundation, aluminum siding, and a gable roof with asphalt shingles and a northeast-southwest ridge. There is a cross-gable in the center bay with a northwest-southeast ridge. The northeast elevation has a modern metal six-panel door in the north bay and a one-over-one sash in the east bay. There is a two-bay porch with three square wood columns and a hipped roof with asphalt shingles. The gable end has a small lancet sash with two lights. There is a wood box cornice with returns. On the northwest elevation the center bay is recessed slightly back of the north bay and has a cross-gable. There is a pressure-treated wood deck and stairway off of the second story. The west bay is recessed even further back from the center bay. The southeast elevation has a two-story, three-sided bay window in the center, topped by the cross-gable roof.

Significance:

In 1907 brothers Joshua, John, and George Gardner sold a one-acre lot in Jessup to their sister, Arma, who would never marry, for $100. Arma Gardner built this house for herself at that time. In the period c. 1890-1915 one nationally popular type of dwelling was a two- or 2 ½-story structure with the gable end set toward the street. Of a type dubbed by Alan Gowans a Homestead Temple house, it was available as a kit from companies like Sears or Radford, and could have easily been delivered to Jessup on the B. & O. Railroad. Local carpenters also copied these buildings without benefit of pre-cut parts, however, and which route Arma Gardner took is not known. Her house is perhaps most significant in its illustration of an unmarried woman's strategy, and ability, to live independently.

The Arma Gardner House is located at 7948 Old Jessup Road, in Jessup, in eastern Howard County, Maryland. The house is located on the southwest side of the road and faces northeast, toward the road. It is a 2 ½-story, two-bay by three-bay frame structure with a brick foundation, aluminum siding, and a gable roof with asphalt shingles and a northeast-southwest ridge. There is a cross-gable in the center bay with a northwest-southeast ridge. The northeast elevation has a modern metal six-panel door in the north bay and a one-over-one sash in the east bay. There is a two-bay porch with three square wood columns and a hipped roof with asphalt shingles. The second story has two one-over-one sash, and the gable end has a small lancet sash with two lights. There is a wood box cornice with returns. On the northwest elevation the north bay has paired one-over-one sash on the first story and no opening on the second story. The center bay is recessed slightly back of the north bay and has a one-over-one sash on the first story, a modern metal six-panel door in the second story, and no opening in the end of the cross-gable. There is a pressure-treated wood deck and stairway off of the second story. The west bay is recessed even further back from the center bay, and has no opening on the first story and a one-over-one sash on the second story. The southwest elevation has no openings. The southeast elevation has a three-sided bay window in the center, topped by the cross-gable roof, and there is a one-over-one sash in each side on both stories. Both the south and east elevations have a one-over-one sash on each story. There is one-bay by one-bay, frame cellar entrance enclosure in the south bay, with a shallow gable roof that has asphalt shingles and a northwest-southeast ridge.

Summary:

In 1907 brothers Joshua, John, and George Gardner sold a one-acre lot in Jessup to their sister, Arma, who would never marry, for $100. Arma Gardner built this house for herself at that time. In the period c. 1890-1915 one nationally popular type of dwelling was a two- or 2 ½-story structure with the gable end set toward the street. Of a type dubbed by Alan Gowans a Homestead Temple house, it was available as a kit from companies like Sears or Radford, and could have easily been delivered to Jessup on the B. & O. Railroad. Local carpenters also copied these buildings without benefit of pre-cut parts, however, and which route Arma Gardner took is not known. Her house is perhaps most significant in its illustration of an unmarried woman's strategy, and ability, to live independently.

Significance:

When William Gardner died in 1896 he owned two farms, "Waterloo" and "Shamrock," and a business located on 29 ¼ acres at Jessup. The business was operated in conjunction with Gardner's three sons, Joshua, John, and George, and in 1899 they acquired full title in all three properties from their mother, Susan, and their two sisters, Arma Gardner and Annie Hawkins. In 1907 the three brothers sold a one-acre lot in Jessup to Arma, who would never marry, for $100. She likely had lived with her parents, and then with her widowed mother. Presumably her mother had died and, having the means to, Arma Gardner built this house for herself. In the period c. 1890-1915 one nationally popular type of dwelling was a two- or 2 ½-story structure with the gable end set toward the street. These were often two bays wide, with a third bay set back from the front of the house, where the front door was located, and a porch across the front that wrapped around to the entrance. These houses would have a cross-gable and often bay windows on one or both sides. Arma Gardner's house seems to be a smaller version of this house type, eschewing the third, recessed bay and placing the entrance on the front close to the street. Since she was a spinster, a smaller house such as this would have been sufficient for her needs. Nonetheless, this house can hardly be considered small. Of a type dubbed by Alan Gowans a Homestead Temple house, it was available as a kit from companies like Sears or Radford, and could have easily been delivered to Jessup on the B. & O. Railroad. Local carpenters also copied these buildings without benefit of pre-cut parts, however, and which route Arma Gardner took is not known. Her house is perhaps most significant in its illustration of an unmarried woman's strategy, and ability, to live independently. In the eighteenth century in this country some fathers, especially among the well-to-do, began to leave money in trust for their single daughters, knowing that they would never marry. This trend increased throughout the nineteenth century leading to independent, and seemingly economically secure, spinsters like Arma Gardner. Her house probably has a side passage with a parlor to the front, a dining room oriented across the center of the house, and a kitchen in the back, with three chambers and a bath room on the second story. The house has suffered the usual modern updates--aluminum siding and new windows--but retains much of its character.¹
